

THE UNUSUAL in FUR COATS

A Bolero of Moleskin

Hudson Seal Russian Blouse

ELAGANCE, style and comfort are combined in the fur coats this year to the satisfaction of the woman. The use of fur is an undeniable fact, and all owners will uphold the initial cost as justifiable and proclaim the garment as an excusable luxury. If you have ever owned a wrap of fur you will be interested in these models that depart from the lines of other years; if you are contemplating a purchase, there are notable features that will lead you to a selection that you will not regret.

In a new cutaway line is the wrap of Hudson seal that is buttoned up the back, at the side under fur buttons that are arranged in groups of two at the upper and lower parts of the wrap. At the front the coat extends below the waist line, dropping down as it sweeps back and ending in a wide, full, pointed collar. The collar is a fur collar that is wide at the edge and is slightly ruffled as it stands up around the neck. Long sleeves are finished with turned back cuffs.

A stylish combination of caracul and skunk is shown in the short coat that has a narrow papum and a full blouse. This opens at the neck, tipped off with a wide fur collar, and has a wide fur belt at the waist. The front fastening is a single line with small buttons, and a girdle of black satin defines the waist line. The sleeves are not quite full length, and the coat is a wrap type. The blouse is a kimono line, and the whole jacket is an attractive outer wrap for an afternoon dress on a day that is not in the zephyr class. This coat will be popular with an average woman, especially if the dress is trimmed with bands of caracul fur or any of the excellent fur cloths that are so much in vogue.

With the new drapery and a bow of wide black ribbon to carry out the butterfly idea, the wrap of moleskin is worthy of all the favor that will be given it. This is a comfortable garment and has never been in the kimono type, which adds to the original looseness of line. There is a square collar at the back only, and the lower edge of the wrap is decidedly longer in the back, the point looking like the drooping wings of the butterfly. The bow at the back is the result of the satin girdle that defines the waist line.

Russia is a big factor in the success of the fur coat. It contributes to the unusual by offering to you the attractive combination seen of Hudson seal and marten. The sleeves are elbow length and are edged with fur. The collar promises protection to the neck, and the jaunty side fastening is decorated with large buttons. The wide fur belt of fur defines the waist line, and the papum is shorter than the usual Russian blouse. The muff is of the soft nillow papum variety and is trimmed with fur, and can be crushed into any form that the owner desires.

It is not surprising in this day of the bolero to find a coat of fur that is a combination of the unusual. Of moleskin this model is made, with the pelts running in stripes that are in themselves trimming. There is a single fastening under a fur wrap, and the collar is a wide, bell-shaped. At the collar is a strip of fur that has its echo in the buckle of the fur on the moleskin hat that complements the coat.

There are other novelties in fur coats. The long scarf that is wrapped around the body and tied in a bow at the back is a favorite with the ladies, and is a combination and a copy of the butterfly wrap of smaller size. Then there is the wrap with one sleeve that can be changed so that it hangs at the back and completely alters the draped models to keep the lines in their original beauty. The combination of furs adds the touch of the unexpected to the coat, and the matching of the furs can not be ignored in the racing of the belts or the disposing of the folds. Fullness will give a decided departure from the lines of other years. Yes, the unusual is apparent, and the imagination can notice in the brave designer who saw the possibilities for the combination of furs and beauty.

A Chronicle of the Strange Adventures of John Haynes and His Gyroscope Vehicle

By H. M. EGEBERT

ROLES REVERSED

In Which John Haynes Becomes His Enemy and Sends Himself to Prison.

No scoundrel on the grand scale was ever so successfully contrived as that of the Nokomis Land Company. The members of the organization had flushed out western property from John Haynes, an Englishman; had torn him from his wife and daughter, crippled him with a bullet, forced him to flee, and while he lay helpless in the hospital, railroaded him into the penitentiary for fourteen years, under the name of Peter Thompson, notorious criminal, and, giving out that Haynes had accepted a million dollars in settlement of his claims, and had gone back to England, they divided their plunder and sent their wives, with the cities of Nokomis, built on the stolen land, sprang into being and brought them ample and continuous incomes in the shape of hotel rents and sales on the installed railroads.

The company was dissolved. There was nothing corporate for Haynes to seek to be avenged upon when he came back to America, but the holders of innocent property, holders who had obtained their titles in good faith. Nor did he plan to do so. He had no confidence in justice, and he had no friends among the conspirators to help him. While working in the prison machine shop, he invented a powerful gyroscope, which, when attached to any vehicle, or to a man's every move, caused him to travel at incredible rates of speed along roads or railway lines. With the aid of this, he escaped, located his daughter, sent her to Chicago to await his summons, and then turned all his attention to finding his wife and wreaking vengeance upon his enemies.

Haynes knew that, like his daughter, his wife must have been a scoundrel. She had not sought him out. One man alone knew where she could be found: Chauncey E. Robertson, of Bendersville, the only lawyer that had been able to bring him into the power of the most corrupt judge that had sentenced him, and who lay helpless in prison, awaiting what he knew was death. This was the reason why he had not sought him out. One man alone knew where she could be found: Chauncey E. Robertson, of Bendersville, the only lawyer that had been able to bring him into the power of the most corrupt judge that had sentenced him, and who lay helpless in prison, awaiting what he knew was death.

When he awoke it was daylight. He started up in some confusion at first, not knowing where he was. Then, stretching himself and yawning, he heard a faint click at the door. It was upon the best means of affecting his escape unnoticed. He was about to open the shuttered window, gazing out through a chink in the painted street, when the faint click at the door postman had dropped a letter into the box. Haynes hesitated: then, very deliberately, he unbolted the front door, walked down the patch of weed, and took the letter.

It was addressed to Chauncey E. Robertson.

Then the man came there secretly, he thought, as he tore it open. He went into the parlor, took a seat in the library and read it. It began without address and briefly informed the recipient that he had opened a real estate office in a certain number of downtown streets, Omaha. There was no signature. This was a clue.

Omaha lies some three hundred and fifty miles east of Bendersville. That was the reason why Haynes had sought his wife there, and running swiftly along the railroad lines through the darkness, halting only to make a tour of the larger stations, he reached Omaha in the early morning and made his way to the address given. It was a small, old building in an old part of the city: it was not guarded and it was easy to pick through a hole in the fence.

When he awoke it was daylight. He started up in some confusion at first, not knowing where he was. Then, stretching himself and yawning, he heard a faint click at the door postman had dropped a letter into the box. Haynes was disengaged. Evidently his enemy had resolved to place him self beyond reach of retribution, and, taking his own life in his hands, had set out to find another part of the country. That Haynes forced an entrance into the basement of the house, and emerged in the hallway where, striking a match, he lit the candle which he had brought with him and proceeded to make a systematic investigation.

He was surprised to find the house well furnished, even the grand piano in the living room, there were pictures upon the walls and costly furniture and rich carpets. But the whole place was falling into decay. Dust covered everything with a thick layer of white, the paper was hanging in mildew streaks from the walls, the piano was cracked, and the doors were fastened each room. Evidently Robertson had bought the house with the intention of making it his permanent home, evidently, too, an old man who had no sense of panic or the conviction that Bendersville was not sufficiently remote from the scene of his exploits, had driven him to seek other refuge, and in such haste that he had not time to dispose of his furnishings. Perhaps he had not dared to take the risk of returning. This "evidence" of his flight was still more obvious to Haynes when he entered the house. The curtains were drawn, the draperies, in which the salves of a log fire; here it was a table containing copies of old magazines and a ash-tray in which was a stump of a cigarette with which he had smoked, and while he lay helpless in the hospital, railroaded him into the penitentiary for fourteen years, under the name of Peter Thompson, notorious criminal, giving out that Haynes had accepted a million dollars in settlement of his claims, and had gone back to England, they divided their plunder and sent their wives, with the cities of Nokomis, built on the stolen land, sprang into being and brought them ample and continuous incomes in the shape of hotel rents and sales on the installed railroads.

Evidently the other visitors had visitors.

He looked round him and then perched himself upon a chair in the dust that covered the carpet steps other than his, and fingered upon the mahogany writing table.

He was a scoundrel, he thought, who would have removed at least that vestige upon the mantel, and the gilt clock that had run down—the books, too, that stood there beside the writing table. What Robertson had done for himself, perhaps, or some agent of his? If so, what did he come for?

Haynes found the half empty box of matches, the ash-tray, the cigarette holder, and kindling the charred log with some scrap of newspaper—not without difficulty, for they were damp with mildew—strung out his legs to the limit and fell asleep.

When he awoke it was daylight. He started up in some confusion at first, not knowing where he was. Then, stretching himself and yawning, he heard a faint click at the door postman had dropped a letter into the box. Haynes hesitated: then, very deliberately, he unbolted the front door, walked down the patch of weed, and took the letter.

Perhaps he had not dared to take the risk of returning. This "evidence" of his flight was son's leniency, and he had been upon the crest of a certain hill. And here he was at the place where John Haynes was concealed. As he read this, Haynes' heart leaped; now he knew that he could dislodge him, and then, in time, with the necessity of bargaining with Robertson. On him he could wreak vengeance to the full. And he still lived, thank God!

His wife would see him out until he had accomplished all that he had planned; then he would take her and Eleanor and return to England, leaving Nokomis and his stolen lands behind him. The Governor should reward him for his services.

"I want Mr. Robertson," he stammered.

"Yes," said Haynes. "I am Mr. Jenkins. You are, too, Paul," he added, referring to the butler.

"You are not Chauncey E. Robertson," muttered the other. "Who are you?"

Haynes pulled out his card-case and handed his visitor a card on which was engraved the name of Chauncey E. Robertson. "Evidently he is a case of mistaken identity," he said.

The other had been staring hard at him all the while. He knew him at last.

"I have not been here five years since I was a poor boy in the office of Mr. Robertson's law office at Nokomis.

"John Haynes placed the Governor's letters in his breast pocket, replacing his card-case and locking the door again.

There was no sign that any midnight visitor had entered the real estate office. The front o'clock had stopped, and ten minutes later he was once more in Bendersville, in Robertson's house.

The morning he took up his residence in the old hotel, signing his name as Chauncey E. Robertson upon the register. By nightfall all the town knew that Mr. Robertson had come back to Bendersville.

Next day the shutters upon the windows of the house were folded again and an army of workmen was placed at work upon its renovation. As the days passed, Haynes became personally unknown to anyone in Bendersville. He made secret inquiries and discovered that none of the officials in the local bank had been there since he had the pleasure of doing for you."

The other looked at him and looked again. The face seemed familiar, and though he could not name the man he had seen under a cloud of suspicion.

"I want Mr. Robertson," he stammered.

"Yes," said Haynes. "Come into the room, Paul. I have a pen and paper for you ready." "Dear Mr. Haynes, I am Mr. Jenkins, your butler."

"I have not come to Bendersville for the first train. I have an immediate offer for the house at a figure which will surprise you, but it must be taken at once. You are a poor boy, and it is necessary to come to Bendersville by the first train. I have an arrangement for you."

"What did you sign here?" he asked.

"I have signed here," said Franka. "But not unless you want to," he added.

"Of course, I want to," said Franka.

"You may sign here," said Franka. "I have his name in a large, legible hand."

Then Haynes took off his beard and the two men rose from where they were seated and stood one on each side of Robertson.

"Come along," said one of them briskly.

"I beg your pardon," said Robertson briefly. "Then as he turned, he found himself looking into the face of Haynes. He knew him at once. He gasped, staggered backward; and his hands were snapped on his wrists.

"What is the charge?" he muttered as they helped him to the door.

"Forgive," replied the lawyer curtly.

Robertson's hands were freed and he was known to all his friends in Omaha as Haynes. He could not call on anyone in Nokomis to identify him. He had forged his own name for $500.

a direction to the back. Mr. Carpenter's assistant was continuing to work, his hand comprehensively toward two gentlemen with large, unpolished boots, who sat behind the table rather gloomily. Mr. Robertson, my lawyer, was seated.

"Franka, have you the title-deed ready?"

Franka placed it upon the table and Robertson read it over carefully. Then taking a pen, he signed the title-deed and handed it to the lawyer.

"Where shall I sign?" he asked.

"You may sign here," said Franka. "I have his name in a large, legible hand."

"My profoundest sympathy goes out to the Yaw boys in their terrible affliction," vouchsafed the Altafia Sage.

"They came of a large and gung-holess family, every member of which is noted for their remarkable talents in shooting, and a uniform success in finding it. They invariably stand in the path of onrushing motor cars while looking aloft to see if the geese are coming. They are noted for their art in arriving in the wee small hours to drink enough medicine out of a bottle of poison so thoroughly hidden that a man and a bloodhound are necessary to find it.
